Dogs are also the mascots of many schools. Yale high school and the University of Georgia both use bulldogs as their mascot. I can't think of any school that uses house cats as a mascot. Dogs are thought of as a stronger animal than cats, and most dogs are.

Another reason why I like dogs better is that dogs listen a lot better than cats. If I call my dog over to me, it will come and be happy. If I try to call my cat and make it get up; it will just walk down to the cat room and ask for food. Some dogs listen better than others, but will come to its owner when called. They also stop better. When my cat starts clawing away at furniture, you cant just yell and tell it to stop you have to get up and push it away. If a dog is digging a hole in the lawn or something else it is not supposed to do, all the dog needs to hear is his name. My dog just liked to be around people so all it needs is to hear his name and will come to the fence.

Cat's also leave their claw marks everywhere. Clawing away at all new furniture and doors, I have to spray my cat with water to make him quit. If I am in my room with the door shut, my cat will scratch at the door, until it gets some kind of attention: if I let the cat in after I hear it at the door the cat will come in my room and cry for food.

Dogs can also do a lot of cool tricks. Dogs can jump really high and catch a stick or any other object in there mouth. They can also play dead, rollover, shake hands and speak whenever told to. It is very funny to watch someone due a halftime show of a game where dogs are catching Frisbees and doing all sorts of different tricks. I have never seen a halftime show where small cats put on an entertaining show.
